Silly / Trivial / Not worth much

くだ 下らない

Kudaranoi

silly / trivial / not worth much

Variants

- くだ はなし 下らない話 a silly story
- くだ わら 下らないことで笑う to laugh at something silly
- くだ おもしろ
下らないけど面白い silly but funny
- と た 取るに足らない not worth taking seriously

Adjusted Expression

あまり価値がありません。

It does not have much value.

Example

A 「この映画、くだ えいが 下らないよね」 B 「うん、でも、そのくだ くだ 下らなさがいいんじゃない」

A: This movie is silly, isn't it? B: Yeah, but isn't that silliness what makes it good?

Notes

"Kudaranai" is used when the speaker feels that something has little value or importance. In this example, A calls the movie "kudaranai," but B receives its "kudaranasa" as part of what makes it enjoyable. The suffix "-sa" attaches to an adjective stem and nominalizes the quality or degree expressed by the adjective. Here, by turning "kudaranai" into "kudaranasa," B treats that very silliness as a positive quality of the movie. For this reason, "kudaranai" can be a strong negative evaluation, but it can also express light humor, absurdity, or easy-going fun. When directed at someone's idea or work, it can sound rude, so it should be used with care. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "It does not have much value" or "It cannot be considered highly valuable."

Not really / Not very much

あんまり...ない

Anmari ... nai

not really / not very much

Variants

- あまり...ない
not really ...
- そんなに...ない
not that much ...
- それほど...ない
not to that extent ...
- あんまり
not really

Adjusted Expression

あまり...ません。

not very ...

Example

A 「料理^{りょうり}、する？」 B 「うーん、あんまり」

A: Do you cook? B: Hmm, not really.

Notes

"Anmari ... nai" is a colloquial negative expression used when the degree or frequency of something is not high. In this example, B is asked "Do you cook?" and answers only "anmari." Even without saying the rest, "shinai" (I don't), the meaning "I don't cook much" is understood from the previous question. "Anmari" does not make a strong denial; it softens the negative response. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with "amari ... masen" (not very ...).

Variants

- ほぼ...ない
almost not ...
- めったに...ない
hardly ever ...
- ほとんど...しない
almost never ...
- ほとんど...ありません
there is almost no ...

Adjusted Expression

ほとんど...ません。

hardly ever ... / almost no ...

Example

A 「週末、遊びに行く？」 B 「うーん、ほとんど行かない」

A: Do you go out on weekends? B: Hmm, I hardly ever go out.

Notes

"Hotondo ... nai" is a negative expression used when the frequency, amount, or degree of something is very small, close to zero. In this example, B is asked whether they go out on weekends and answers "hotondo ikanai," meaning that they hardly ever go out. Compared with No.602 "anmari ... nai," which works as a softer negative expression, "hotondo ... nai" is stronger and suggests that the action almost never happens or that there is almost none of something. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with "hotondo ... masen" (hardly ever ... / almost no ...).

Variants

- ～とか^{かんけい}関係なく
regardless of ...
- ～とか^き気にしないで
without worrying about ...
- ～とか^{もんだい}問題にしないで
without making ... an issue
- ～とか^{かんけい}関係なしに
without regard to ...

Adjusted Expression

～などを^と問わず、

regardless of ...

Example

A 「ラグビー^{らぐびー}って、天気^{てんき}とか関係^{かんけい}なく、試合^{しあい}するの？」 B 「ああ、雨^{あめ}でもやるよ。うん、関係^{かんけい}なくね」

A: In rugby, do they play games regardless of the weather? B: Yeah, they play even in the rain. The weather doesn't really matter.

Notes

"...toka kankei naku" is a spoken expression used when a condition or factor is not treated as relevant to an action or judgment. In this example, A asks whether rugby games are played regardless of the weather, and B answers that they play even in the rain. "Tenki toka kankei naku" means that the weather is not treated as a condition or deciding factor. It is not "toka" alone that means "regardless of"; the whole expression "...toka kankei naku" works as a unit. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "tenkou o towazu" (regardless of the weather) or "...nado o towazu" (regardless of ...).

Variants

- って言ったじゃん

- って言ったでしょ
I told you, right?
- って言ったのにさ
I told you so, you know.

Adjusted Expression

さき^{さき}ほど^{つた}お伝えしました。

I mentioned that earlier.

Example

A 「忘れ^{わす}物^{もの}しちゃった」 B 「だから、忘れ^{わす}るよって言ったのに」

A: I forgot it. B: That's why I told you you'd forget it.

Notes

"Tte itta no ni" is a spoken expression used when the speaker had already given a warning or prediction, but the other person did not take it in and the problem actually happened. In this example, B had already said that

A might forget it, and when A does forget it, B reacts with "wasureru yo tte itta no ni." The "no ni" adds the feeling of dissatisfaction: I told you, but it still happened, or you did not listen. Because it can easily sound reproachful, it should be used with care. Except when used jokingly with someone close, in formal contexts it can be replaced with expressions such as "I mentioned that earlier" or "As I said earlier."

I ended up going that way

- そっち^いに行っちゃったよ

I accidentally went that way

- そっち^いに行っちゃったんだ

I drifted in that direction

- ^{はなし}話がそっち^いに行っちゃった

The conversation went that way

Adjusted Expression

^{はなし}話がそち^そちらに逸れてしまいました。

The conversation has drifted in that direction.

Example

A 「猫^{ねこ}が好^すきなんですねえ」 B 「何^{なん}の^{はなし}話^{はなし}だったっけ？ また、そっち^いに行っちゃった」

A: So you like cats. B: What were we talking about again? I drifted that way again.

Notes

"Socchi ni icchatta" is a colloquial expression used when the topic or attention has drifted away from the original direction. In this example, B loses track of what they were talking about and says "mata, socchi ni icchatta," noticing that the conversation has gone in another direction again. "Socchi" can refer not only to a physical direction, but also to the direction of a topic, interest, or thought. The "chatta" ending adds the feeling that it happened unintentionally or despite the speaker's intention. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with "The conversation has drifted in that direction."

Variants

- はや はなし
• 早い話が long story short
- てみじか い
• 手短に言うと to put it briefly
- よう
• 要するに in short
- かんたん い
• 簡単に言うと

Adjusted Expression

てみじか い

Example

A 「きのう かいぎ なが
昨日の会議、長かったね」 B 「うん、はや はなし だれ しゃちょう べんとう か
うん、早い話、誰かが社長のお弁当を買っ てくるってこと？」

A: Yesterday's meeting was long, wasn't it? B: Yeah, long story short, someone has to go buy the president's bento, right?

Notes

"Hayai hanashi" is a spoken expression used when the speaker skips a long explanation or complicated background and states only the conclusion. In this example, B sums up the long meeting as "someone has to go buy the president's bento, right?" It is close to "you suru ni" (in short), but "hayai hanashi" can carry light irony or exasperation when the conclusion is simple or somewhat silly compared with the long process leading up to it. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "to put it briefly" or "to summarize."

- ^{ちょうし あ}調子が合わない

Adjusted Expression

Example

A 「この^{ふく}服、なんか^あ合わないよね」 B 「うん、^{いろ}色も^{がら}柄も^あ合っていないかも」

A: This outfit doesn't really suit me, does it? B: Yeah, the color and the pattern may not really work.

Notes

"Awanai" is used when things, people, situations, or feelings do not match or do not fit well together. In this example, A says "nanka awanai yo ne" about an outfit, expressing that the color, pattern, or overall impression does not feel right. "Awanai" can refer to size not fitting, but it can also refer to atmosphere, taste, style, or compatibility not matching. It is also used for interpersonal compatibility, as in "ano hito to wa awanai" (I do not get along with that person). In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "It does not fit," "It is not appropriate," or "The compatibility is not good."

Example

A 「これ、か
貸してくれる？」 B 「うん、でも、かなら かえ
必ず返してよ」

A: Can you lend me this? B: Yeah, but make sure to return it.

Notes

"Kashite kureru?" is a casual request used when the speaker wants to borrow something from the listener. In this example, A says "kore, kashite kureru?" to ask the listener to lend something. "Kasu" means to lend, and "kureru" shows that the action is directed toward the speaker's side. "Kashite ageru" has the opposite direction: it means that the speaker lends something to someone else. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "Please lend it to me" or "Could I borrow it?"

- そういう^{ばあい}場合もあるかな
That might be an option
- そういう^{かんが}^{かた}考え方もあるかな
That way of thinking could work too
- それもありかも

Adjusted Expression

そのような^{かんが}^{かた}考え方もありますね。

That could also be considered an option.

Example

A 「この^{はな}花、^{みせさき}店先に置くよりも、^{なか}中の方がよくない？」 B 「そうねえ、^{ほう}そういうものもあるかな」

A: Wouldn't it be better to put these flowers inside rather than at the storefront? B: Yeah, that could work too.

Notes

"Sou iu no mo aru kana" is a spoken expression used when the speaker hears someone else's suggestion or idea and accepts it as one possible option. In this example, B responds to the suggestion of putting the flowers inside by saying "sou iu no mo aru kana." The speaker is not strongly agreeing, but is also not rejecting the idea; they are recognizing it as a possibility. The ending "kana" adds the feeling of thinking it over or keeping the judgment somewhat open. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "That way of thinking is also possible."

Variants

- これだけしかない
there's only this much
- これだけしか持^もっていない
I only have this much
- これだけしか残^{のこ}っていない
only this much is left
- たったこれだけ？
only this much?

Adjusted Expression

これだけしかありません。

There is only this much.

Example

A 「はい、お小遣^{こづか}い」 B 「え、たったこれだけ？」

A: Here is your allowance. B: What, only this much?

Notes

"Tatta kore dake" is a spoken expression used when the speaker feels that the amount or number is smaller than expected. In this example, B receives an allowance and reacts with "tatta kore dake?", expressing surprise or dissatisfaction that it is less than expected. "Kore dake" points to the amount, and "tatta" emphasizes how small the speaker feels it is. When used directly in response to someone's kindness or payment, it can sound rude, so it should be used with care. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "There is only this much."

A 「いいとか、^{わる}悪いとかじゃなくて...」 B 「でも、^{けっきょく}結局、したくないんですよ」

A: It is not about whether it is good or bad... B: But in the end, you just do not want to do it, right?

Notes

"...janakute," is a spoken expression used when the speaker rejects one way of seeing or judging something and shifts the conversation to another perspective. In this example, A says "ii toka, warui toka janakute...", meaning that the issue is not whether it is good or bad. However, B reads the underlying point and says, "But in the end, you just do not want to do it, right?" "Janakute" is not simply a negation; it can signal that the current frame is not the one the speaker wants to use, and that the listener should look at the matter from another angle. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "not ..., but ..." or "it is not a matter of"

A: Even if I say it, it won't make any difference. B: That may be true, but you still have to tell them...

Notes

"...ta tokoro de" is used when the speaker feels that even if an action is taken, the expected result will not occur or it will not make a meaningful difference. In this example, A says "itta tokoro de, imi ga nai," meaning that even if they say it, the situation will not change. It is close to "...temo" (even if), but "...ta tokoro de" is often followed by a negative conclusion and can carry a sense of resignation or futility. - いま いきお
● 今、...がすごく勢いありますよね
Right now, ... has a lot of momentum, doesn't it?

Adjusted Expression

さいきん かっぱつ
最近、...がとても活発です。

Recently, ... has been very active.

Example

A 「いま DTMが、すごいげんきじゃないですか」 B 「うん、しろうと かんたん つく 素人でも簡単に作れるからね」

A: DTM is really active these days, isn't it? B: Yeah, because even amateurs can make music easily now.

Notes

"Ima, ... ga sugoi genki janai desu ka" is a spoken expression used when the speaker points out that a field, person, or activity is very active or has strong momentum these days, while inviting the listener to share that recognition. In this example, A presents the idea that DTM is currently very active by saying "sugoi genki janai desu ka." The ending "janai desu ka" is not just a question; it creates a shared premise, suggesting that the listener probably recognizes the same situation. "Sugoi genki" can be used for people, and more casually for fields or activities. In more formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "Recently, ... has been very active."

A: You haven't seemed very energetic lately. B: The reason is, I've been busy with work...

Notes

"Nande ka to iu to" is a spoken expression used when the speaker is about to explain the reason or background for their state, judgment, or situation. In this example, B is told that they have not seemed energetic lately and begins the explanation with "nande ka to iu to," saying that they have been busy with work. "Nande" is more casual than "naze" (why), and "ka to iu to" creates a lead-in to the reason that follows. It is a little more orderly than No.554 "naze kattsuu to." In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "The reason is" or "If I may explain why."

Example

A 「^{ひと}だいたいの人^{おも}がこれでいいと思っている」 B 「いや、^{かぎ}そうとは限らないよ。」

A: Most people think this is fine. B: No, that's not necessarily the case.

Notes

"Iya, sou to wa kagiranai yo" is a spoken expression used to respond to someone's opinion or generalization by saying that it is not necessarily true. In this example, A says that most people think this is fine, and B replies "sou to wa kagiranai yo," showing that there may be exceptions or other possibilities. The opening "iya" makes the countering move clear, but "sou to wa kagiranai" is not a total denial; it holds back the generalization. A: I already paid earlier, so I'll pay this time too. B: No, that's a separate matter.

Notes

"Sore wa sore, kore wa kore" is a spoken expression used when the speaker treats two matters separately instead of mixing them together. In this example, A says that since he paid earlier, he will pay this time too, but B replies "sore wa sore, kore wa kore," separating the earlier payment from the present one. It does not simply mean that two things are different; it also draws a line so that one matter is not used as the reason for handling the other. Notes

"Sonna koto itta tte" is a spoken expression used when the speaker hears the other person's explanation or excuse but still feels that it does not resolve their complaint or demand. In this example, A gives the reason that he is very busy, but B replies "sonna koto itta tte," showing that even if he is busy, B still wants him to keep his promise. The speaker is not completely ignoring the reason, but is saying that the reason is not enough to make them accept the situation. A: He is really busy. B: That's not true. He was hanging out yesterday too.

Notes

"Sonna koto nai yo" is a spoken expression used to directly deny what someone has said or how they see the situation. In this example, A says that he is really busy, but B replies "sonna koto nai yo" and denies that explanation by pointing out that he was hanging out yesterday too. Compared with No.618 "sonna koto itta tte," which accepts that the other person has given a reason but says that the reason is not enough, "sonna koto nai yo" denies the claim itself. It is natural in close conversation, but if said strongly, it can sound like a direct rejection of the other person's view. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "That is not the case" or "It cannot be said that way."

さも^{じゅうし}重視してほしい」 B 「そうだね、^み見た目も^め大事だよね」

A: With this software, it's not just about being usable or working. I also want ease of use to matter. B: Right. The way it looks matters too.

Notes

"Tsukaereba ii, ugokeba ii tte iu n janakute" is a spoken expression used when the speaker says that merely being usable or working is not enough and shifts the discussion to another standard of value. In this example, A says that for this software, it is not enough that it can be used or that it works; ease of use should also matter. The speaker first quotes the low standard "tsukaereba ii" and "ugokeba ii," then rejects it with "tte iu n janakute," creating another axis of evaluation such as quality, usability, or appearance. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "It is not only important that it can be used or that it works."

Adjusted Expression

きょうしゆく 恐縮ですが、それはお受^うけ取^とりできません。

I am sorry, but I cannot accept that.

Example

A 「これ、先^{せん}日^{じつ}のお礼^{れい}です」 B 「いや、それは...」

A: This is a thank you for the other day. B: No, that's...

Notes

"Iya, sore wa..." is an incomplete spoken expression used when the speaker finds it difficult to accept someone's offer or action directly, and shows apology or hesitation before giving a clear refusal. In this example, B is offered a gift of thanks and stops with "iya, sore wa..." instead of either accepting it immediately or clearly refusing it. At this point, the interaction already works: B acknowledges the other person's kindness while showing hesitation about accepting it as it is. The unfinished form itself does important work. In formal contexts, if the speaker needs to be explicit, it can be replaced with expressions such as "I am sorry, but I cannot accept that."

A 「これはなかなか^{こわ}壊れませんよ」 B 「そう^{やすやす}易々と^{だま}騙されるもんか」

A: This is quite durable. B: I won't be fooled that easily.

Notes

"Yasuyasu to" means easily or without difficulty. It does not mean cheaply in terms of price. In this example, B does not immediately believe the other person's explanation and says "sou yasuyasu to damasareru mon ka," meaning "I won't be fooled that easily." While "yasuyasu to" can simply mean "easily," it often appears in expressions involving caution or resistance, such as being deceived easily, backing down easily, or handing something over easily, especially in negative forms. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "easily" or "without difficulty."

Personally,

Example

A 「この映画、面白^{えいが}かった？」 B 「ぼく^{てき}的には、あまり良^よくなかったかな」

A: Did you enjoy this movie? B: Personally, I didn't think it was very good.

Notes

"Boku teki ni wa" is a casual spoken expression used to mark what follows as the speaker's own subjective opinion. In this example, B says that the movie was not very good, but by adding "boku teki ni wa," the speaker shows that this is not a general evaluation, but their own personal impression. The pattern "X teki ni wa" attaches to a noun and creates a temporary standpoint or perspective. It is now also commonly used with people or organizations, as in "Nakamura-kun teki ni wa, dou omou no?" (How do you see it, Nakamura?) or "kaisha teki ni wa" (from the company's standpoint). However, expressions such as "boku teki ni wa" and "Nakamura-kun teki ni wa" are casual spoken forms. In formal contexts, they can be replaced with expressions such as "personally," "in Mr. Nakamura's view," or "from the company's standpoint."

A「この仕事、^{しごと}大変だよね」 B「うん、世の中の^{よ なかてき}には、^あ当たり前^{まえ}なんだろうけど」

A: This job is tough, isn't it? B: Yeah, generally speaking, people may think it's normal, though.

Notes

"Yo no naka teki ni wa" is a casual spoken expression used when the speaker refers to how something is generally seen or judged by society. In this example, B feels that the job is tough, but says "yo no naka teki ni wa, atarimae nan darou kedo," putting some distance between their own feeling and what people in general may think. "Yo no naka teki ni wa" does not refer to a clear opinion held by a specific person; rather, it temporarily sets up the vague standpoint of society or the public. Like No.623 "boku teki ni wa," it uses the pattern "X teki ni wa" to create a viewpoint, but here the viewpoint holder is society rather than an individual. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "generally speaking" or "in society at large."

A 「これ、^{あた}^ら 新しい^げ ^ー ^むゲームだよ」 B 「え、それ、^{ぼく} ^す僕の好きなやつじゃないですか」

A: This is a new game. B: Huh, isn't that exactly the kind of thing I like?

Notes

"E, sore, boku no suki na yatsu janai desu ka" is a spoken expression used when the speaker sees something presented by the other person and reacts by recognizing that it matches their own taste. In this example, B sees the new game and says "boku no suki na yatsu janai desu ka," expressing both surprise and pleasure. "Yatsu" here does not refer to a person; it casually refers to a thing or type of thing. "Janai desu ka" is not just a question; it creates the feeling that the listener can share or recognize the speaker's reaction. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "That is the kind of thing I like" or "That suits my taste."

Example

A 「これ、^{あた}新しい^きキー^ーボ^ード^どだよ」 B 「いいの^{げ っ と}ゲットしたね」

A: This is my new keyboard. B: You got a good one, didn't you?

Notes

"Ii no getto shita ne" is a casual spoken expression used when the speaker notices that the listener has obtained something good and responds with praise or shared pleasure. In this example, B sees the listener's new keyboard and reacts positively by saying "ii no getto shita ne." "Ii no" is a casual form meaning "a good one," and "getto shita" is a very casual way to say "got," "obtained," or "bought." The expression does not simply recognize the listener's possession; it also suggests "You chose a good one" or "Good for you." A: How was the party yesterday? B: Well, we ate and drank, and... yeah, that's about it. A: Same as always, huh?

Notes

"...te, hai, ..." is a spoken trailing-off pattern used after listing actions, when the speaker has nothing much more to add and hands the conversation back to the listener. In this example, B says "tabete nonde, hai," meaning that they ate and drank, and that was about it. "Hai" here is not an answer of "yes"; it works more like an interjection that wraps up the talk and lets the listener take it. The utterance is incomplete as a sentence, but that incompleteness itself helps end the explanation and pass the turn. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "...and that was about it."

It may be good.

Example

A 「この^へッ^どホ^ん、どう？」 B 「うん、なんか、^い良いかも」

A: How about these headphones? B: Yeah, I kind of like them.

Notes

"Nanka, ii kamo" is a spoken expression used when the speaker feels a positive possibility about something, even though they cannot yet clearly explain why. In this example, B tries the headphones and says "nanka, ii kamo," showing a favorable impression while the evaluation is still forming. "Nanka" signals a vague feeling whose reason has not yet been articulated, and "kamo" avoids a firm assertion and presents the judgment as a possibility. For this reason, the expression can leave the evaluation open and invite the listener's response or further opinion. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "It may be good" or "I have a favorable impression."

Either is fine.

Example

A 「お昼は^{ひる}和食？ ^{わしょく}洋食？」 B 「どちらでも、」

A: For lunch, Japanese food or Western food? B: I'm fine with either.

Notes

"Dochira demo," is a spoken trailing-off expression used to show that either of two options is acceptable and to leave the choice to the listener. In this example, B shows that either Japanese food or Western food is fine, leaving room for the other person to decide. A fuller form would be "dochira demo ii desu" (either is fine), but by stopping at "dochira demo," the speaker naturally conveys that they do not have a strong preference and can go along with the listener's choice. Depending on the situation, however, it may also sound as if the speaker is avoiding making a decision. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "Either is fine" or "Either is acceptable."

Example

A 「この問題、もんだい どうする？ やめる？」 B 「うーん、それしかない」

A: What should we do about this problem? Quit? B: Hmm, there's no other choice.

Notes

"Sore shika nai" is a spoken expression used when the speaker judges that no other option remains. In this example, A suggests quitting as a way to deal with the problem, and B answers "sore shika nai," accepting that there is no method other than quitting. "Shika nai" limits the choice to one option and closes off other possibilities. It can express a firm decision, but it can also carry resignation, as if the speaker has no choice but to accept the situation. Example

A 「この^{けいかく}計画、^{せいこう}成功するよ」 B 「それ、どうだろ？」

A: This plan will succeed. B: I'm not so sure about that.

Notes

"Sore, dou daro?" is a spoken expression used when the speaker has some doubt about what the other person has said or judged. In this example, A states that the plan will succeed, but B replies "sore, dou daro?" showing that they are not ready to accept that conclusion. "Dou daro" does not strongly deny the claim; it holds back judgment and gently introduces doubt. It can also be used to ask for someone's opinion, but in this example its main function is to softly stop the other person's assertion. In formal contexts, it can be replaced with expressions such as "I have some doubts about that" or "It cannot be said for certain that it will succeed."

A: Can you solve this problem? B: This is hard. No one would know the answer.

Notes

"Wakaru hito nante dare mo inai" is a spoken expression used when the speaker feels that a problem or content is so difficult that no one would understand it or know the answer. In this example, B looks at the problem and says "wakaru hito nante dare mo inai yo," judging that it is too difficult for ordinary people to solve. "Dare mo inai" is a total negation, and "nante" adds the feeling that it is hard to even imagine such a person existing. Example

A 「これはあまりよくないよ」 B 「じゃあ、なんかありますか？」

A: This one isn't very good. B: So, do you have anything?

Notes

'Jaa, nanka arimasu?' is used after the other person has rejected or criticized the current option, and the speaker asks for another suggestion or possibility. 'Jaa' makes the utterance arise as the next reaction to the other person's negative comment. Although 'arimasu?' is polite in form,

'nanka arimasu?' is not a fully adjusted request like 'Do you have any good suggestions?'. It hands the next move back to the listener. Depending on the situation, it can sound not only like a neutral check but also like mild pushback: if this is no good, then what else do you have?

Notes

'Jikan aru?' does not simply ask whether the listener possesses time. It opens the possibility of talking, asking for something, or starting a consultation. The noun 'jikan' is presented first, and 'aru?' immediately checks the listener's availability, making the expression short and highly immediate. The reply 'Un, ii yo' does not only mean that the listener has time. It also means that the speaker may begin: you can talk, you can ask, or you can start.

Example

A 「この^{ていあん}提案、どうする？」 B 「やや、^{なや}悩んでる、」

A: What should we do about this proposal? B: Still mulling it over, ...

Notes

'Yaya, nayanderu,' is not mainly a statement of deep emotional distress. It shows the listener that the speaker has not yet reached a decision. Compared with 'chotto,' 'yaya' sounds somewhat more formal or self-observing in ordinary conversation, and it creates a small distance from the speaker's own hesitation. The speaker is not simply throwing out a worry, but lightly objectifying the current internal processing state: I am still in the middle of deciding. Because the utterance stops at 'nayanderu,' it does not give a conclusion. It hands the unfinished state to the listener as an incomplete sentence.

Notes

'Ima, mita no wa,' brings up something the speaker has just seen and prepares to ask what it was. Here 'ima' means 'just now' or 'a moment ago', not 'recently' in a broad sense. By stopping at 'mita no wa,' the speaker places the seen object in front of the listener as a noun phrase, while leaving its identity or explanation unfinished. The utterance shares the immediate experience and hands the task of identification to the listener: what was that thing I just saw?

Example

A 「^{ゆうしょく}夕食、^{なに}何にする？」 B 「^{さかな}魚、^{つく}作ったよ」

A: What should we have for dinner? B: I made fish.

Notes

'Sakana, tsukutta yo' does not mean that the speaker literally made a fish. It means that the speaker prepared a dish using fish. By putting 'sakana' first as a noun, instead of saying a fully adjusted sentence like 'I cooked fish,' the speaker immediately presents it as a meal option in response to the question. 'Tsukutta yo' reports not only the completion of cooking, but also the shared availability of the food: it is already prepared, and you can eat it.

Notes

'Pin to konai' does not simply mean that the speaker cannot understand something. The speaker may understand the explanation or see the object, but acceptance, response, or a sense of rightness has not arisen internally. The verb 'konai' presents this as something that has not arrived: the intuitive reaction has not been activated. In evaluating a design, the expression allows the speaker to hand over a vague but immediate mismatch before giving any specific reason.

Example

A 「ひさしぶり！げんきしてる？」 B 「うん、げんきだよ」

Notes

'Genki shiteru?' does not simply ask about the listener's health. It lightly opens the listener's recent situation, especially when the speaker has not seen them for a while. Here 'genki' combines with 'suru' and appears as

'genki shiteru,' expressing a continuing state. This does not mean that the dictionary-like form 'genki suru' is freely used in ordinary speech. Rather, the expression becomes natural within the conversational chain 'Genki shiteru?' Many Japanese nouns can combine with 'suru' and become suru-verbs, but learners often do not notice that a state noun like 'genki' can appear in this kind of verbal form. After 'Hisashiburi!', it functions as a way to restart contact and gives the listener a place to begin talking about how they have been.

Somehow, it's weird.

Variants

- なんとなく、^{へん}変。
Somehow, it's weird.
- なんだか、^{へん}変。
Something feels off.
- なんとなく、おかしい。
It feels kind of strange.
- Something's not right.

Adjusted Expression

なんとなく、^{いわかん}違和感があります。

I have a vague sense that something is off.

Example

A 「この^{でざいん}デザイン、どう？」 B 「うーん、なんか、^{へん}変」

A: How about this design? B: Hmm, something feels off.

Notes

'Nanka, hen' shows that a sense of unease has arisen before the speaker can clearly explain the reason. 'Nanka' indicates that the basis of the evaluation has not yet become clear. 'Hen' can be a strong judgment, but with 'nanka' before it, the utterance does not simply reject the object. It shares a felt impression: I cannot yet say why, but something feels off to me. In evaluating a design, it works as an immediate reaction before any specific problem is stated.

Variants

- やっておいてよかった。

I'm glad I did it.

- しておいてよかった。

I'm glad I took care of it.

- やつといてよかった。

I'm glad I got it done.

Adjusted Expression

しておいて^{せいかい}正解でした。

It was the right thing to do.

Example

A 「これ、^{さいご}最後の^{ひと}一つ？」 B 「まだあるよ。たくさん^か買っ^ていてよかったね」

A: Is this the last one? B: There are still more. I'm glad we bought a lot.

Notes

'Shitoite yokatta' is used when a past action turns out to have been useful later. 'Shitoite' is a casual form of 'shite oite,' meaning to do something in advance in preparation for a future need. 'Yokatta' reevaluates that past action positively from the present result. In the example 'Kattoite yokatta ne,' the earlier action of buying a lot is connected to the present relief that there is still enough left.

Sorry this is all I can do

Variants

- これぐらいしかできなくて、
Sorry this is all I can do,
- これだけしかできなくて、
Sorry I can only do this much,
- これぐらいしかできなくて、すみません。
I'm sorry this is all I can do.

Adjusted Expression

これぐらいしかできなくて、^{もう}^{わけ}申し訳ありません。

I'm sorry this is all I can do.

Example

A 「これ、^{てっだ}手伝ってくれてありがとう」 B 「ごめんね、これぐらいしかできなくて」

A: Thank you for helping me with this. B: Sorry this is all I can do.

Notes

'Kore gurai shika dekinakute,' presents what the speaker has done as not quite enough, while expressing apology or hesitation toward the listener. 'Kore gurai' makes the speaker's contribution sound limited, and 'shika dekinai' marks that nothing more could be done. Because the utterance stops at 'dekinakute,' the apology is activated even when 'gomen ne' or 'sumimasen' is not explicitly added. In the example, the listener is thanking the speaker, but the speaker still feels that their help may not have been enough and offers that sense of insufficiency first.

Variants

- これだけはさせて
Please let me do this much.
- これぐらいはさせてください。
Let me at least do this much, please.

Adjusted Expression

これぐらいは^{わたし}私に^{まか}任せてください。

Please let me handle at least this much.

Example

A 「これ、^{てっだ}手伝ってくれてありがとう」 B 「これぐらいはさせて」

A: Thank you for helping me with this. B: Let me at least do this much.

Notes

'Kore gurai wa sasete' is used when the listener thanks the speaker or hesitates to accept help, and the speaker offers to do at least this much. 'Kore gurai' presents the speaker's action not as a large contribution, but as a small and reasonable one. The particle 'wa' sets a minimum line:

even if I cannot do everything, please let me take care of at least this much. Because the utterance stops at 'sasete,' it does not sound like an order. It remains an incomplete sentence that asks for permission while offering the speaker's willingness.

Variants

- まったく ^{うご}動かない。

It doesn't budge at all.

- まったく ^{うご}動かない。

- ^{ぜんぜんうご}全然動かない。

Adjusted Expression

まったく ^{うご}動きません。

It does not move at all.

Example

A 「この ^どドア、^あ開けてみて」 B 「うーん、^{びく}ビクともしない」

A: Try opening this door. B: Hmm, it doesn't budge at all.

Notes

'Biku to mo shinai' does not simply mean that something does not move. It means that even after force is applied or someone tries to move it, there is not the slightest response. 'Biku' evokes a tiny movement or reaction, and 'to mo ... nai' emphasizes that even that minimum reaction does not occur. In the example, the speaker reports the result immediately after trying to open the door: it did not move even a little.

Adjusted Expression

Example

A 「これが、^{いぜん}以前、^{はな}話してたものなの？」 B 「ううん、それ、^{べつもの}別物」

A: Is this what you were talking about before? B: No, that's something different.

Notes

'Sore, betsumono' is used when the listener identifies something with a previous item or another thing, and the speaker cuts that connection and corrects it. 'Betsumono' does not only mean another physical item. It can also mean that even if two things look related or similar, they are qualitatively different and should not be treated as the same. By stopping with the noun 'betsumono,' the speaker immediately cancels the identification before giving any longer explanation.

Adjusted Expression

まったくの素人なので、あまり期待しないでください。

Please don't expect much, as I'm a complete amateur.

Example

A 「この仕事、手伝ってくれる？」 B 「ごめんね、ど素人なんで、あまり役に立てないかも」

A: Can you help me with this work? B: Sorry, I'm a complete amateur, so I might not be much help.

Notes

'Doshirouto nande, ...' is used to show in advance that the speaker is not knowledgeable in the relevant field and to lower the listener's expectations. The prefix 'do-' strongly intensifies 'shirouto,' positioning the speaker as a complete amateur or someone who really does not know much. Because 'nande, ...' gives the reason first, it is likely to be followed by expressions such as 'I might not be much help,' 'I may say something strange,' or 'please teach me.' This is not merely self-introduction. It is a prefacing expression that hands the speaker's limitation to the listener before speaking or participating.

It will take a little more time.

Example

A 「仕^し事^{ごと}、終^おわった？」 B 「もうちょっと掛^かかる」

A: Is the work finished? B: It'll take a little longer.

Notes

'Mou chotto kakaru' tells the listener that the task is not finished yet, while avoiding making the remaining time sound too large. 'Mou chotto' indicates that more time is still needed, but also suggests that the end is not far away. 'Kakaru' means that time will be required. In the example, the listener asks whether the work is finished, and the speaker immediately adjusts that expectation: it is not done yet, but it should be done after a little more time.

Example

A 「彼、^{かれ}行っちゃったよ」 B 「いったい^{ぜんたい}全体、^{なに}何が^お起こったの？」

A: He left. B: What on earth happened?

Notes

'Ittai zentai' is used when an event or situation is hard to understand and the speaker asks a question with strong surprise or confusion. 'Ittai' alone already intensifies a question, but adding 'zentai' expands the force of the question and gives the sense that the whole situation is puzzling: what is going on here? In the example, after hearing that he has left, the speaker has not yet organized the situation and first reacts with a strongly marked question: what on earth happened?

Adjusted Expression

それは、どういう意味でしょうか？

What does that mean?

Example

A 「今日は、無料です」 B 「それ、どういうことですか？」

A: Today is free of charge. B: What do you mean by that?

Notes

'Sore, dou iu koto desu ka?' is used when the speaker receives the listener's statement but cannot immediately understand its meaning or implication. 'Sore,' picks up the listener's previous utterance, and 'dou iu koto desu ka?' asks what that utterance means, or what reason or condition lies behind it. The expression does not merely ask for the meaning of a word. It returns the speaker's halt in understanding to the listener and asks for an explanation. In the example, 'Today is free of charge' is unexpected, so the speaker asks what the reason or arrangement is.

Adjusted Expression

There is nothing I can do about this.

Example

A 「この問題^{もんだい}、解決^{かいけつ}できる？」 B 「ごめんね、こればかりは、どうすることも...」

A: Can you solve this problem? B: Sorry, there's nothing I can do about this one.

Notes

'Kore bakari wa, ...' marks the matter as an exception and shows that the speaker cannot do anything about this particular case. 'Kore bakari wa' draws a line: other things may be possible, but this one is different.

When it is followed by an unfinished phrase such as 'dou suru koto mo ...,' the impossibility or refusal is understood even without being fully stated. Together with a troubled expression or hesitation, it becomes an incomplete sentence that shows the speaker's limit while still leaving consideration for the listener.

Example

A 「この書類^{しよるい}、提出^{ていしゅつ}しなきゃ？」 B 「うん、これは必要^{ひつよう}」

A: Do I have to submit this document? B: Yes, this one is necessary.

Notes

'... wa hitsuyou' is used to give an immediate judgment about whether something is necessary. The speaker can say 'hitsuyou desu,' but in conversation, stopping at 'hitsuyou' presents the judgment briefly. 'Kore wa hitsuyou' does not merely mean that the document is important. In response to the question of whether it must be submitted, it returns the judgment that this document cannot be omitted and is required as a condition. A key point is that 'hitsuyou,' which looks like a noun or adjectival-noun stem, functions directly as the predicate.

A: I watched a movie yesterday. B: Oh, speaking of movies, that director's new film was released recently.

Notes

'... to ie^{ie}ba, ...' picks up a word or topic from the listener's previous utterance and uses it as a starting point for a related topic. It does not completely change the subject. Rather, it keeps a connection with the previous topic while inserting the speaker's association or related information. Notes

'Myou ni, ...' shows that something feels different from usual before the speaker can clearly explain why. 'Myou' does not simply label something as strange. It creates the sense that something is not normal, or that something is hard to explain but noticeable. A: Please explain this plan in detail. B: First, to put it very roughly, the main point is to maximize profits.

Notes

'Sugoku, zatsu ni iu kedo, ...' is used when the speaker puts forward an understanding or judgment that has not yet been fully organized. 'Zatsu ni' does not only admit that the explanation is rough. It also tells the listener that what follows is a provisional outline before the details have been adjusted. In immediate conversation, speakers do not always begin after fully organizing what they want to say. A: Can we solve this problem? B: Hmm, in the end, maybe it's difficult because it takes time and costs a lot.

Notes

'Kekkyoku, ... ja nai ka tte' is used when the speaker has considered several conditions or circumstances and offers a provisional conclusion to the listener. 'Kekkyoku' gathers the preceding details and points to where the matter finally seems to land. '... ja nai ka' is not a direct assertion. It presents a judgment as something that seems reasonable. The final 'tte' keeps the judgment from being fully closed and leaves room for the listener to consider it as well. In the example, after considering time and cost, the speaker does not directly assert that the problem is difficult, but offers that conclusion as a shareable view.

Notes

'... te kurenai?' is a casual request expression used when the speaker wants the listener to do something for them. Although it has the form of a negative question, it is not used here to state a negative meaning. It asks whether the listener will do the action for the speaker. 'Kureru'

A: We met that person yesterday, right? B: Yeah, I can't remember his name, but wasn't he the new department manager?

Notes

'... arimasen deshita kke?' is used when the speaker checks a past event or piece of information against the listener's memory. 'Arimasen deshita ka?' can ask whether something existed or happened in the past, but adding 'kke' gives the utterance the sense of memory checking: I think this was the case, but I want to confirm it. The speaker is not asking about something completely unknown. Rather, they offer a partially recalled piece of information and try to align it with the listener's memory. A: This is mine. I got this. B: No, that's not it. Everyone got one.

Notes

'Sore, chigau yo' is used when the speaker responds to the listener's statement or understanding and immediately corrects it. 'Chigau' does not only judge something as wrong. It can also show a mismatch: that is not the object, not the interpretation, or not the direction. 'Sore,' picks up the listener's previous statement or understanding, and 'chigau yo' stops it from continuing as it is. The final 'yo' makes the correction something the speaker offers for the listener to notice. In the example, A thinks the item belongs only to them, and B corrects that understanding by saying that everyone received one.

Notes

'Soko wa kirikaete' is used when the listener is caught in a certain feeling or situation, and the speaker suggests changing how that part is handled.

'Soko' does not refer to a physical place. It points to the specific point, phase, or emotional sticking point that the listener is dealing with.

'Kirikaete' asks the listener to shift their way of thinking, mood, or action into another mode. In the example, the listener is being pulled down by work and fatigue, and the speaker advises them not to stay in that state but to switch gears and change their mood.

Notes

'Sonna kanji ga suru' is used when the speaker cannot give a clear reason, but wants to share the feeling that a situation is probably like that. 'Sonna' picks up the impression or possibility that has just been mentioned in the conversation, and 'kanji ga suru' presents it not as a firm assertion but as a felt judgment. For that reason, this expression is less like a strong prediction and more like a response meaning, yes, I think it is probably going in that direction too. In the example, A suggests that she may not come, and B responds with 'sonna kanji ga suru' to show that they share the same impression.

- ああ、なんか、^{へん}変なこと、^{はな}話しちゃって、
Oh, I ended up talking about something weird,
- ああ、なんか、^{へん}変なこと、^い言っちゃって、
Oh, I said something kind of weird,

Adjusted Expression

^{しょうしょう}少々、^{ふてきせつ}不適切な^{はつげん}発言をしてしまい、^{もう}申し^{わけ}訳ありませんでした。

I made a slightly inappropriate remark, and I apologize.

Example

A「^{きのう}昨日、^あ会ったとき、^{へん}変なこと、^い言っちゃって、ごめんね」 B「^きううん、気にしないで」

A: Sorry for saying something weird when we met yesterday. B: No, don't worry about it.

Notes

"Oh, I ended up saying something kind of weird," is used when the speaker looks back on what they said and offers it to the listener as something that may have sounded a little strange. "Nanka" shows that the evaluation is still vague, and "icchatte" presents the utterance as something the speaker ended up saying unintentionally. Because the sentence stops with "te," the apology is not fully completed, leaving room for the listener to respond with something like "Don't worry about it."

Adjusted Expression

ちょうど

It is just right.

Example

A 「この服、サイズ、ちょうどいいね」 B 「うん、似合ってるよ」

A: This fits just right. B: Yes, it suits you.

Notes

"Just right" is used when the speaker evaluates something as fitting a standard or expectation at that moment. It can mean not too big or too small, not too strong or too weak, not too much or too little. The focus is not simply that something is good, but that it fits the present conditions without excess or deficiency.

I do things like taking walks and shopping, but...
- うんどう 運動したりしてるんですけど、
I do things like exercising, but...
- どくしょ 読書したりしてるんですけど、
I do things like reading, but...

Adjusted Expression

たとえば、さんぽ 散歩、どくしょ 読書、りょうり 料理など、さまざまなことをしています。

For example, I do various things such as taking walks, reading books, and cooking.

Example

A 「さいきん ひま 最近、暇なの？」 B 「うん、さんぽ 散歩したりしてるんですけど、なに しゅみ 何かいい趣味があればおし 教えてくれるとうれしいな」

A: Do you have a lot of free time lately? B: Yes, I do things like taking walks, but I'd be happy if you could suggest a good hobby.

Notes

"I do things like taking walks, but..." is used when the speaker explains what they have been doing recently by giving one example, while leaving a sense that it is not quite enough. "Shitari shiteru" suggests that taking walks is only one activity among others. Because the sentence stops with "kedo," the explanation is not completed there. It leaves room for the next move, such as asking for advice or implying that the current activities are not fully satisfying.

That's wonderful, isn't it?

- ^{おどろ}驚くべきことじゃないですか。

That's surprising, isn't it?

- ^{かんとうてき}感動的じゃないですか。

Adjusted Expression

That's wonderful.

Example

A 「^{あた}新しい^{くるま}車、^か買ったんだ」 B 「へえ、すごいじゃないですか。どんな^{くるま}車？」

A: I bought a new car. B: Wow, that's pretty amazing. What kind of car is it?

Notes

"That's pretty amazing, isn't it?" is used when the speaker gives an immediate positive evaluation of the listener's action, achievement, or situation. "Sugoi" expresses a strong positive evaluation, but "ja nai desu ka" makes it sound like something the listener can also recognize as true. It is therefore not just an expression of surprise, but a response that acknowledges the listener's achievement and keeps the conversation moving in a positive direction.

Adjusted Expression

まったく問題^{もんだい}ありません。

There is absolutely no problem.

Example

A 「遅^{おく}れてごめんね」 B 「ううん、ぜんぜんいいですよ」

A: Sorry for being late. B: No, it's totally fine.

Notes

"It's totally fine" is used in response to the listener's apology or hesitation, strongly indicating that there is no problem and reducing the listener's burden. "Zenzen" was traditionally associated with negative expressions, but in spoken Japanese it can also combine with positive expressions such as "ii" or "daijoubu." Here, it does more than simply say that something is fine. It immediately cancels the listener's concern and reassures them that they do not need to worry.

Example

A 「心配^{しんぱい}しないで、大丈夫^{だいじょうぶ}？」 B 「うん、ぜんぜん^{へいき}平気です」

A: Don't worry. Are you okay? B: Yes, I'm totally fine.

Notes

"I'm totally fine" is used in response to the listener's concern, indicating that the speaker is not having any problem. "Heiki" suggests that the speaker is not affected by pain, anxiety, difficulty, or awkwardness. With

"zenzen," the response becomes stronger: the speaker is not just somewhat okay, but has no problem at all. While No.665 "zenzen ii desu yo" accepts the listener's action or apology, this expression presents the speaker's own state in order to reassure the listener.

Notes

"While using ..." indicates that the act of using something and another action or change are proceeding at the same time. "Tsukaitsutsu" is close to "tsukainagara," but it sounds slightly more explanatory and is often used when describing a working process or approach. Because the expression stops with "tsutsu," it does not complete the sentence by itself. It leads into the next action, such as getting used to something, adjusting it, or checking how it works.

A: I meant to go to bed yesterday, but before I knew it, I had ended up watching movies until morning. B: That's rough.

Notes

"Kizuitara, ... shitemashita" is used when the speaker looks back and realizes that they had drifted into an action or state without fully noticing the process at the time. "Kizuitara" does not simply mean the literal moment of noticing. Rather, it indicates retrospective recognition: only at that point does the speaker become aware of what had been going on. "... shitemashita" is a colloquial form of "... shite imashita," and it gives the utterance a tone of looking back with a bit of surprise.

A: Have you read any interesting books lately? B: Yes, there are genres I hadn't really seen before.

Notes

"There are things like ..." is used when the speaker brings an example or type into the conversation and lets the listener know that such things exist. "Toka" presents the item loosely as one example, while "aru n desu yo" presents it as something the speaker has found, knows about, or thinks the listener may not yet know. It is not merely a statement of existence. It shares information while drawing the listener's attention.

Example

A 「この新しいアプリ、使ってみた？」 B 「うん、とんでもないアプリですよ。すごく便利で役に立つ」

A: Have you tried this new app? B: Yes, it's an incredible app. It's really convenient and useful.

Notes

"It's an incredible app" indicates that the app made such a strong impression that an ordinary evaluative word is not enough. "Tondemonai" can be negative or positive depending on the context, but here it gives a positive evaluation: the app is far beyond what the speaker expected. With "desu yo," the speaker presents this surprise and evaluation to the listener, suggesting that the listener should also recognize its value.

A: That movie was really moving, wasn't it? B: Yes, it was a story full of love, and it really stayed with me.

Notes

"... ai ga afureru" is an evaluative expression used when the speaker feels that warm emotions such as love or compassion are so full in a work, a person, or a scene that they seem to flow outward. "Afureru" suggests not just the existence of emotion, but a sense that it cannot be contained and is visibly overflowing. For that reason, the expression works less as an objective description and more as a way for the speaker to share an immediate impression of warmth with the listener.

A: Does she have children? B: I don't know. It's not something to ask about, and it's a bit private.

Notes

"It's not something to ask about" is used when the speaker judges that asking about a certain topic is not appropriate and draws a boundary in the conversation. "Kiku you na koto ja nai" does not simply mean that the information is unnecessary. It indicates that, considering the relationship, the private nature of the topic, or the situation, one should not step that far into it. The final "shi" gives one reason while leaving room for other reasons as well, helping redirect the conversation away from the topic.

Notes

"What is this?" in this entry is an immediate reaction to something unexpected or hard to understand. It is not a calm request for information like "What is this?" in a neutral setting. The expression first conveys surprise or strangeness, as if the speaker is saying that the object or situation does not fit ordinary expectations. It is used when the speaker sees something strange, unfamiliar, or different from what they expected.

Example

A 「車^{くるま}に轢^ひかれそうになったんだ」 B 「ええ、^{あぶ}危ないところでしたよ」

A: I almost got hit by a car. B: Wow, that was a close call.

Notes

"... tokoro deshita yo" indicates that an event came close to happening but did not actually happen. It is used with a preceding verb phrase, as in "I almost got hit" or "I almost dropped it." The expression looks back on the situation after the danger or failure has already been avoided, carrying a sense of "that was close." The final "yo" presents that sense of danger or relief to the listener.

A: I bought a new gadget. B: I don't need that kind of thing. What I have now is enough.

Notes

"I don't need that kind of thing" is used when the speaker strongly pushes back against something the listener has brought up, treating it as unnecessary for them. "Sonna mon" is a casual form of "sonna mono," but it does more than refer to the object. It also makes the object sound low in value. For that reason, "iranai yo" is not only a denial of necessity, but also a refusal: the speaker is saying that it is not worth accepting. Since it directly rejects the listener's suggestion, gift, or idea, it can sound harsh depending on the situation.

A: What should I do? My wallet is gone! B: Calm down. It's okay. Let's check your bag first.

Notes

"Calm down" is used when the listener is panicking, rushing, or emotionally upset, and the speaker wants them to stop reacting for a moment and regain composure. It is not only reassurance, but also an entry point for checking the situation or deciding what to do next. However, because it treats the listener as someone who is not calm at that moment, it can sound commanding or condescending depending on the tone and relationship. Expressions such as "Just calm down for a moment" or "Let's calm down first" can make it softer.

Notes

"And then, before I knew it, ..." takes up the previous flow of the story and introduces a resulting state that the speaker only noticed afterward. "De," is not just a neutral connector. It lets the story slide from the previous event into the next result. "Ki ga tsuitara" suggests that the speaker was not fully aware of the process while it was happening, and then retells the event from the point where they noticed the result.

Notes

"What is ...?" is used when the speaker picks up a word or expression just used by the listener and asks what it means or what it refers to. "Tte" lifts the previous word into the focus of the conversation, and "nani?" requests an explanation. It is not only a question about an unknown word. It also pauses the flow of the conversation and hands the expression back to the listener, asking how it should be understood.

Notes

"If there is someone nearby who can have that kind of conversation, ..." expresses a desire or ideal: having someone nearby with whom that kind of conversation is possible. "Sonna kaiwa" refers back to the topic or atmosphere just mentioned, and it does not mean just any casual chat. It points to a conversation whose content, depth, or emotional tone can be shared. When the expression stops at "chikaku ni iru to," it leaves room for an evaluation such as "it would be nice," "it would help," or "I would be happy," indirectly showing the speaker's sense of isolation or hope.

Notes

"... masu yo ne" is a sentence-final pattern in which the polite form "masu" is followed by "yo ne," asking the listener to share the speaker's recognition. "Yo" presents the speaker's judgment to the listener, and "ne"

seeks shared recognition. It is therefore not just agreement. It works to establish something as common ground in the conversation. The listener can also echo the previous predicate briefly, as in "shimasu yo ne" or "arimasu yo ne."

- sentence-final expression

That's not what I'm saying.

そういうことを言^いってるんじゃないくて、

sou iu koto o itteru n ja nakute, ...

That's not what I'm saying.

Variants

- そういうことを言^いってるんじゃないくて、実^{じつ}は...
That's not what I'm saying. Actually, ...
- そういうことを言^いってるんじゃないくて、つまり...
That's not what I'm saying. What I mean is ...
- そういうことを言^いってるんじゃないくて、要^{よう}するに...
That's not what I'm saying. To put it simply, ...

Adjusted Expression

そういうことを言^いっているわけではなく、...

That is not what I mean.

Example

A 「つまり、この仕事^{しごと}、やりたくないんですね」 B 「いやいや、そういうことを言^いってるんじゃないくて、この仕事^{しごと}には問題^{もんだい}があるってことです」

A: So, you don't want to do this job, right? B: No, no. That's not what I'm saying. What I mean is that there are problems with this job.

Notes

"That's not what I'm saying" is used when the listener has interpreted the speaker's words in a different direction, and the speaker wants to stop that interpretation. "Sou iu koto" refers to what the listener has just summarized or understood. "Itteru n ja nakute" denies that interpretation, saying that this was not the intended meaning. The speaker then restates what they actually wanted to say. The expression is not just a denial. It redirects the flow of the conversation and rebuilds the explanation.

Adjusted Expression

その可能性もあります。

That possibility also exists.

Example

A 「もしかしたら、きょう 今日、あめ 雨がふ 降るかもしれないね」 B 「うん、かさ 傘をも 持っていたほうがいいかもね」

A: It might rain today. B: Yes, maybe we should take an umbrella.

Notes

"Perhaps, ..." is used to bring something into the conversation as a possibility, without treating it as certain. By presenting it as something that could be the case, the speaker can move on to judgments such as "it might be," "it is possible," or "that may be true." "Moshikashite" often sounds more immediate and is often used when checking something with the listener or presenting a possibility just noticed. "Moshikashitara" sounds slightly more settled as a way of introducing a possibility.

That alone would have been enough.

それだけでいいのに...

That alone would have been enough.

Variants

- それだけで^{じゅうぶん}十分なのに。
That alone would have been enough.
- それだけで^{まんぞく}満足なのに。
That alone would have satisfied me.
- それだけでよかったのに。
That alone would have been fine.

Adjusted Expression

それだけで^{じゅうぶん}十分でした。

That alone would have been sufficient.

Example

A 「これに^{あた}ら^きの^う新^{しん}しい機^き能^{のう}を^つ追^い加^かしておいたよ」 B 「え、それだけでいいのに。あんまり^{ふくざつ}複雑^{ふくざつ}にしないでよ」

A: I added a new feature to this. B: Oh, that alone would have been enough. Don't make it too complicated.

Notes

"That alone would have been enough" is used when the speaker feels that one element or condition was already sufficient, but something more has been added. "Sore dake de ii" expresses sufficiency, while "no ni" adds a sense of regret or dissatisfaction that the actual situation has moved away from that sufficient state. It can be used in response to the listener's kindness, addition, or extra effort, suggesting that it was appreciated but not necessary, or even excessive.

Variants

- まあ、いいんじゃない？
Well, I think it's fine.
- まあ、いいんじゃないでしょうか。
Well, it seems okay.
- まあ、いいんじゃないかな。
Well, that should be fine.

Adjusted Expression

とりあえずは、それでよいのではないかと^{おも}います。

For now, I think that would be acceptable.

Example

A 「この^{あ い で あ}アイデア、どう^{おも}思う？」 B 「まあ、いいんじゃないですか。まずはそ^{ため}れで試してみましよう」

A: What do you think about this idea? B: Well, I think it's fine. Let's try it that way first.

Notes

"Well, I think it's fine" is used when the speaker responds to the listener's idea or proposal with a reserved positive evaluation. It does not express strong approval. Rather, it suggests that there does not seem to be a major problem and that the idea is acceptable for now. "Maa" creates some distance from full approval, and "ii n ja nai desu ka" avoids making a direct assertion. The expression therefore works as modest approval or tentative acceptance, rather than enthusiastic praise.

Adjusted Expression

そのように説^{せつ}明^{めい}されると、確^{たし}かにそうだと思^{おも}います。

When it is explained that way, I think that is certainly true.

Example

A 「この問^{もん}題^{だい}、複^ふ雑^{ざつ}に見^みえるけど、ここ^こに線^{せん}を引^ひけば、簡^{かん}単^{たん}だよな」 B 「そ^そう^うい^いう^うふ^ふう^うに言^いわれると、確^{たし}かにそうですね」

A: This problem looks complicated, but if you draw a line here, it's simple, right? B: When you put it that way, that's certainly true.

Notes

"When you put it that way, ..." is used when the speaker's view has shifted somewhat after hearing the listener's explanation or framing. "Sou iu fuu ni" refers to the way the listener has put, understood, or explained the matter. With "iwareru to," the speaker responds that, if seen within that framing, it may indeed be true. It is not necessarily strong agreement. It shows the speaker accepting the listener's viewpoint and adjusting their own understanding or judgment.

- ...なんてみんな見ていませんから、心配しないでください。
No one see such a thing, so please don't be concerned about it.
- ...なんてみんな見ていませんから、気にすることはありません。
No one see such a thing, so there's no need to worry about it.

Adjusted Expression

...なんてみんな見ていませんから、気にしないでください。

No one see such a thing, so please don't worry about it.

Example

A 「このミス、大勢^{み す おおぜい}の人に見^みられたんだ」 B 「いえいえ、他人^{ひ と}のミス^{み す}なんてみんな^み見ていませんから、気^きにしないでください」

A: This mistake was seen by a lot of people. B: No, no one care about someone's mistakes, so never mind.

Notes

'...nannte minna mite imasen kara, ...' is a colloquial expression used when the speaker wants to convey that a certain event or situation has not been seen by others. 'Nannte' means 'such a thing', indicating that it is not something important. 'Minna mite imasen kara' means 'no one see such a thing', emphasizing that the event or situation has not been seen by others.

One of the reasons I started was that I was interested.

Example

このプロジェクトを始めた理由のひとつとしては、あたらしいことにちょうせんしてみたかったです。

One of the reasons I started this project was that I wanted to try taking on something new.

Notes

"One of the reasons I started ..." is used when the speaker explains why they began an action or project by selecting one reason among several possible reasons. By saying "one of the reasons," the speaker shows that this is not the only reason and avoids making the explanation too absolute. "Toshite wa" presents the reason as one candidate or aspect to be taken up. The expression is useful in self-introductions, explanations of activities, and accounts of motivation for research or creative work.

Adjusted Expression

Example

A 「急にこんなこと聞くのも、あれ、なんだけど、それって事実？」 B 「うん、たぶんそうだと思う」

A: It's a bit awkward to ask this suddenly, but is that true? B: Yes, I think it probably is.

Notes

"It's a bit awkward to ask this suddenly, but..." is used before asking a sudden or somewhat delicate question. "Kyu ni konna koto kiku no mo" first acknowledges that the question may be abrupt. "Are" does not point to a specific object. It loosely indicates something like awkwardness, possible rudeness, or difficulty in saying the question directly. By ending with "nan da kedo," the speaker leaves room for the listener to accept the question before it is asked. The expression is more casual than a formal apology, but it still shows more consideration than asking without any preface.

Adjusted Expression

...いただけますか？

Could you please ...?

Example

この書類^{しょうり}を確認^{かくにん}してもらえますか？

Could you check this document?

Notes

"Could you ...?" is used when the speaker wants the listener to do something. Rather than directly saying "please do it," the expression asks whether the speaker can receive the listener's action as a favor. This makes it a request for cooperation rather than a command. "... te itadakemasu ka" is more polite, while "... te kuremasu ka" is more casual. "... te kureru to tasukarimasu" presents the request by saying that the speaker would be helped by the listener's action.

Example

A 「この作業、^{さぎょう}細かくて^{こま}大変^{たいへん}じゃない？」 B 「うん、でも、^{じつ}実^{たの}に楽しい」

A: Isn't this work detailed and difficult? B: Yes, but it's truly enjoyable.

Notes

"It's truly enjoyable" is used when the speaker evaluates an activity or situation as enjoyable with a sense of inner appreciation. "Jitsu ni" is close to "really," but it sounds somewhat more settled and reflective than casual emphasis. It is therefore not simply an excited cry of "This is fun!" Rather, it is suitable when the speaker has experienced something and come to appreciate its value or interest. Without a sentence-final particle, "jitsu ni tanoshii" sounds like the speaker is confirming the evaluation inwardly.

Variants

- もうちょっと^{じかん}時間がかかるかな。

It might take a little more time.

- もうちょっと^{てま}手間がかかるかな。

It might take a little more effort.

- もうちょっと^{じかん ひつよう}時間が必要かな。

It might need a little more time.

Adjusted Expression

もう少し、^{すこ}時間^{じかん}がかかるかもしれません。

It may take a little more time.

Example

A 「このプロジェクト、完了^{ぶ ろ じ え く と かんりよう}までどれくらい時間^{じ かん}が必要^{ひつよう}ですか？」 B 「うーん、もうちょっとかかるかな」

A: How much time do we need to finish this project? B: Hmm, it might take a little longer.

Notes

"It might take a little longer" softly presents the outlook that a task or process is not finished yet and will need a bit more time. "Mou chotto" makes the additional amount sound small, but it does not specify exactly how short or long it will be. "Kakaru" indicates that time, effort, or cost is needed, and "kana" avoids a firm assertion. The expression is useful when the speaker needs the listener to wait, but wants to share the situation without stating it too strongly.

A: Is it true that some people think it's easier to live in the countryside than in the city? B: Some people do think that way.

Notes

"Some people do think that way" is used when the speaker responds to an opinion or reported view without deciding whether it is true. The speaker only acknowledges that there are people who think that way. "Sou iu fuu ni" refers back to the viewpoint or framing just mentioned. "Hito mo iru" places that view as one possible view among others, rather than treating it as a general truth. "Yo ne" shares this recognition with the listener while avoiding a strong statement of agreement or disagreement.

Notes

"We have no choice but to do it, right?" is used when the speaker judges that all other options are closed and only one action remains. "Shika nai" closes off other possibilities and leaves only one action. With "ja nai desu ka," the speaker presents this not merely as a personal judgment, but as something the listener should also recognize given the situation. The expression therefore does more than explain inevitability. It draws the listener into the same situational judgment.

A: Should I look at this hint? B: No, rather, it's better not to look. It will just make things more confusing.

Notes

"Rather, it's better not to look" is used when the expected choice would be to look, but the speaker advises the opposite. "Mushiro" reverses the judgment that the listener or the situation might naturally suggest.

"Minai hou ga ii" does not simply negate looking. It presents not looking as the better option. The expression is useful when looking at a hint, a result, or a detail would actually make things more confusing or increase anxiety.

A: Should we check this first? B: Isn't that obvious? We'll be in trouble later.

Notes

"Isn't that obvious?" is used when the speaker feels that something is so expected or self-evident that it should not need to be questioned.

"Atarimae" does not simply mean "natural" here. It means that something is obvious or expected as a matter of common sense, procedure, or judgment in the situation. With "ja nai desu ka," the speaker presents it as something the listener should also recognize. Depending on tone, it can sound like a fairly strong pushback against the listener's question.

A: Can I borrow this? B: Huh, what are you going to use it for? A: Just for udon. B: Then this smaller one would be better.

Notes

"What are you going to use it for?" is used when the listener is about to use or borrow some object, and the speaker wants to check its purpose. It is not only a request for information. It can also serve as the entry point for deciding whether to lend it, which one to give, or how to help. "Nani ni" asks about purpose or use, and "tsukau no?" confirms the listener's intended use. The expression is casual and is easy to use in everyday situations with people one is familiar with.

Example

A 「この仕事、誰か^{だれ}やってくれる？」 B 「私^{わたし}にやらせて？」 A 「いいよ、お願い」

A: Can someone take care of this work? B: Can I do it? A: Sure, please.

Notes

"Can I do it?" is used when the speaker asks for permission to perform the action themselves. It is not a request for the listener to do something. Rather, it is an offer asking the listener to give the speaker that role or opportunity. Although "yaraseru" is a causative form, in this expression it does not mean forcing someone to do something. It means that the speaker will act with the listener's permission. The short form "yarasete?" is casual and immediate, presenting the speaker's desire to take the action.

A: This cake is delicious. B: Yes. Do you want more? There's still some left.

A: Yes, I'd like a little more.

Notes

"Do you want more?" is used to check whether the listener wants an additional amount of the same thing. "Motto" indicates adding to what is already there, and "hoshii?" directly asks about the listener's desire. The expression is easy to use with food, drinks, play, materials for a task, or anything that can be given in additional amounts. However, it sounds quite direct and familiar, so in more polite situations, "Would you like a little more?" is more appropriate.
